

My Fashion Brand Story – Dripin Hot

My name is Anirudh Vempati, and I am the founder of Dripin Hot, a fashion brand that believes fashion should be for everyone. My journey was full of struggles, but those struggles gave me strength to build something unique.

When I looked at fashion ads, I noticed one thing: most brands use foreign models or celebrities. They look glamorous, but ordinary people cannot connect with them. Also, when we see celebrities modeling clothes, we immediately feel that the brand is luxury, expensive, and not for us. Many people think, “This is too costly, I cannot afford it.”

I wanted to break that mindset. My idea was simple: use common people as models. Students, shopkeepers, homemakers, office workers—anyone who wears clothes in daily life. When people see these faces, they feel inclusivity. They feel, “This brand is for me. I can also wear these clothes.” That became the unique identity of Dripin Hot.

Challenges I Faced

- Money: I started with very little savings. Many times I had to choose between buying fabric or paying rent.
- Doubts from people: Everyone told me, “Without celebrities, your brand will not grow.” Some even laughed at my idea.
- Models: Common people were shy. They thought they cannot look good in front of camera. I had to motivate them and show them their natural beauty.
- Marketing: Without big names, it was hard to get attention. I used social media, small exhibitions, and word of mouth to promote Dripin Hot.

Breakthrough

My first campaign featured college students, a local shopkeeper, and even one grandmother. The photos were simple but very real. People saw themselves in those pictures. Customers started saying:

- “I feel represented.”
- “If she can wear it, I can also wear it.”

That was the turning point. Slowly, Dripin Hot started growing.

Success Today

Today, Dripin Hot is known for authenticity and inclusiveness. We don’t chase glamour; we celebrate real life. Our campaigns go viral because they show real stories, not celebrity faces. Customers trust us because they see themselves in our clothes.

Most importantly, people feel that Dripin Hot is affordable and approachable. They don't see it as a luxury brand that is out of reach. They see it as a brand that welcomes everyone. That inclusivity attracts more customers and builds loyalty.

Lessons Learned

- Be real, people will connect.
- Struggles make you strong.
- Community support is more powerful than celebrity fame.
- Inclusivity makes fashion meaningful and sustainable.

✦ My journey with Dripin Hot proves that fashion is not only for celebrities or foreign models. Fashion belongs to everyone. When you give common people the spotlight, they shine brighter than you can imagine.
